SAN FRANCISCO, Calif., Aug. 23—There is another new baby in the Eisenhower clan and the President was a little disappointed to hear that it, too, is a girl. Grandson David is the only third generation male so far among the Eisenhower brothers' grandchildren.

The President was told about the newcomer at a family gathering at the St. Francis Hotel after the President's arrival in San Francisco Tuesday night. His congratulations were offered, of course, but then he remarked: "It's a shame we aren't getting any more boys in the family."

This youngest Eisenhower is 2-month-old Anne, daughter of the Lloyd Eisenhowers of San Francisco and great-niece of the President. Her parents are a former Washington couple who met while working there for the CIA and married right after the inaugural festivities in 1953.

Mrs. Lloyd Eisenhower, whose husband is now a lawyer, describes what happens when five sets of "Mr. and Mrs. Eisenhower" get together in the same room.

For one thing, there is apt to be a little conversational confusion since Dwight Eisenhower and brother Roy nicknamed their sons "Bud." Family small talk wasn't much different for the Eisenhowers than any other relatives getting together after a separation.

Playing host, the President moved around the room, talking with everybody.

Golf was a choice subject with the men. There isn't a one of them who doesn't play," says Mrs. Lloyd Eisenhower. "My husband told his Uncle Dwight about recently playing in the Cherry Hills Invitational Golf Tournament and he told us about teaching little David to play. The boy is already learning to hit and putt and I think right now he'd rather grow up to be a golfer than President."
